llere I will state that a "pagoda," or ''pyar,'' is not a temple, or of itself n place of worship, but is simply an offering to God. It is promised that whoover creets one escapes all leathsome trausulgration after death, and reaches an importality of absolute rest-a species of eternal death in life or life in death, or rather a tranquillty so complete that Its seconity I can not separate from the idea of death. The nicre building of these children does not win this ineffable rest or conditlea of "ulevana," but it prevents any decadence of the soul after death, and thus enables a man in some near future existence, by a life of purity, to attain this condition. A non may live the greater portion of his life in purity, but one or more backslidings may send his soul after his death into some of the more de-graded animals, and then thousands of years may be passed before it again enters a human being, when a life of plety can again be passed. All of this danger is avolted by building a proper 'pyar.'' This induces men to accumulate wealth and to spend it all he one of these plous offerings. The result is there are thousands upon thousands of them in the land. It is said there are about twenty-tive thensand within a few unles of brawaddy alone. - Carter H. Harrison, in Chicage Mail

The above cut. s a correct copy of one re-creeted in the grand park of the Centennial Exposition, and which has a history particularly interesting at this time. It was built during the early part of the cen-tury in Indiana, and was occupied by Gen, William Henry Harrison during the rampaign in which occurred the fa mous lattle of Tippecanoe. It was used in the famous "log-cablu and hard-cider campaign" of 1840, when the General vas elected President of the United Stales, and is in an excellent state of preservation. This is a typical log-cubin of the primitive variety. Another is rrected on the opposite side of the park, which ludicates the infinence of esthetics, nad that Indians were not unite so numerous or officious in their attentions as in the neighborhood where the other was built The logs of which it was built were hewn square, and some attempt at symmetry was made. The rhimneys of both cabins are a faithful reproduction of one of the forms la vogne la pioneer times, when the quarrying of stone for the po pose was considered "too much work for n shilling." These rude structures mark one limit of the time which has clapsed since the settlement of the Ohio Valley and Central States, while the magaineent buildings of the Centennial Exposition mark the other; or, to express la figuratively, 1788 to 1888.

SPECIAL FEATURES

OF THE CINCINNATI CENTENNIAL EX-POSITION, NOW IN FULL BLAST.

Novelties, Attractions and Curiosities Never Refure Collected Together-Oua ot the Most Complete Muscoms ju the World.

The Chicianutl Centennial is so large and of such n varied character, composed as it is of articles quaint, inge-uious, novel and intricate, from all parts of life country, and from every sort of industry, that it would be impossible to give mything like nundequate iden of it, so the only way left is to tell the reader of a few of the most interesting, leaving it to his imagination to picture what the immense buildings look like when viewed as a whole. Among the things that altrart a good deal of altention is a wonderfully realistic seems of pioneer life on a farm. It scennies a sugge of glood four hundred in one corner la n log-cabin, surwashing, and near-hy is a small boy, rajoying himself in sport. In front of the door imags a soap-kettle, suspunded from poles, and henrath it burns a fre (gas), which boils the seap.
